 The Interview
- Chansons Madecasses Maurice Ravel
- I. The cries of the night bird are heard. The full moon hangs overhead. The bed of leaves scattered with flowers and sweet-smelling herbs, is prepared worthy of the charms of Nahandove, the Beloved. She is expected, and she comes! What enchantment there is to her gaze, how her kisses reach into the soul and her caresses set all the senses aflame. Never was she more beautiful. Already it is time for her to leave, and her lover is filled with regrets and desires. And so he will languish until nightfall, and her return.
 - II. In our fathers' time the whites came to this island, and we showed them our lands and asked them to be our brothers. They promised, but still they went back on their words. First a menacing fort was erected, and thunder was forced into the mouths of brass. Then their preachers wanted to give us a God we did not know. Finally, they spoke of obedience and slavery. The ensuing bloodshed was long and terrible, but they were all wiped out. We have seen new and stronger tyrants come, but these have also vanished while we live on and in freedom.
 - III. The poet finds it pleasant to lie under a leafy tree during the heat of the day and wait for the freshness of the evening wind. While he lies there he would like the women to approach and fill his hearing and vision with their songs and dances. These should go on until the wind begins to rise and the moon starts shining through the trees on the mountain, the time to go and prepare the evening meal.
